Upon her recovery he took her sawy and Mrs. Faiber heard that Gretchen had boen living at No. 101 Canal street, the property of the girl came to Mrs. Faiher, who was then living at No. 32 Forsyth street, and engaged a room. She was out during the entire night and returning early in the forencom slept during the day. One day Gretchen brought a later to the way ward daughter's conduct, and ended with a mobier's plending world that the would resume her life as a domestic or come home. The letter insiceed a ticket to Wursburg, and a request that the girl should resum. Mrs. Flaier said that after reading the bome. The letter inclosed a ticket to Wursburg, and a request that the girl should return at once.

Mr. Fishe said that after reading the that she would write her mother about the girl's conduct. Gristchen then promised to seek employment as a domestic. She spent he night, however, shout the streets, and became a kilicited to opium smoking, and toward the last spent much of her time in Last weak she received another letter from her mother, childing her for her reckless lifts and saying that she (the mother) was coming to New York. This letter the girlt book to Mrs. Fisher, and seems in great fear of her mother's threatend visit. She weemed very lead a better life, but she again fell into avil ways and, after a night spent in an opium don, she walked to the Grand street ferry. She waited until nearly all the passeagers had moved to the front of the ferryboat, technica, leayed overboard.

The body never rose to the surfaces, and the search for it was alwandoned. The body, which is still at the morgae, is that of a girl of needlum helpit, with a fair complexion and of the physique. Long treases of biombel life and bealt she had evidually been pretty. An inquest will be held by the corner and the remains buried in potter's field.
